A MESSAGE FROM JERRY DIXON, ARTISTIC DIRECTOR:

Playwright, Simon Stephens, skillfully uses coarse language and actions to illustrate differences between the corrupted behaviors of the adults in the play, versus the unique, special qualities of fifteen-year-old Christopher Boone.

SCRIPT CONTENT DETAILS (CONTAINS SPOILERS):

For additional information about the content of this production, including character descriptions and a detailed synopsis, please refer to the Audience Guide.

Language: Strong language is used throughout the play. There are multiple uses and variations of “fuck,” “shit,” “hell,” “Christ,” “God’s sake,” “ass,” “bastard,” and “crap.” There are also a few uses of ableist language, including “stupid,” “idiot,” and “lunatic.”
Violence: The murder of a neighbor's dog is discussed at various moments throughout the play. In the opening scene, Christopher screams and hits a policeman. There is an abstract depiction of violence where Ed slaps Christopher from a distance, and although his hand does not make contact with Christopher, he reacts as though he has actually been slapped. Christopher later discovers letters from his mother describing a memory in which she hit Ed, as well as another memory where she threw food across the room and Christopher threw a cutting board at her, breaking her toes. When a policeman grabs Christopher at the train station, Christopher screams and the policeman lets go. Judy tries to greet Christopher with a hug when he arrives at her home, but he pushes her away and they both fall to the ground. After some implied heavy drinking, Roger yells at and grabs Christopher before Judy restrains Roger. Christopher carries a Swiss Army knife for self-defense and sometimes points it at others when he feels threatened. After finding out that Ed killed the dog, Christopher refers to his father as a murderer.

Sexual Content: Early in the play, Christopher talks about how nonverbal cues can sometimes mean “I want to do sex with you.” There are a few moments where Christopher straightforwardly refers to people “doing sex.” It is revealed that Christopher’s mother had an affair with their neighbor.

Drugs/Alcohol: There is one scene where Judy mimes smoking a menthol cigarette. After an argument with Christopher, Ed says, “I need a drink.” On a train ride, Christopher encounters two intoxicated passengers as they are retrieving their luggage. In London, Roger drunkenly confronts Christopher and grabs him before Judy pulls him back.

Other: Christopher describes a classmate who, “took his trousers off and went to the toilet all over the floor of the changing room and started to eat it.”
